Good afternoon, everyone!

Have you ever wondered whether success depends more on what you know or who you know? While many people argue that having the right connections opens doors, I firmly believe that what you know is far more important.

Think of it this way: connections might help you get an interview, or introduce you to a great opportunity. However, once you walk through that door, your network cannot do the work for you. Your own knowledge, skills, and hard work are the only things that will help you succeed and earn people's trust.

I learned this lesson firsthand last year during our school's annual English drama competition. A close friend of mine was the club president, and she invited me to join the main cast. Because I knew her, I got the role easily. However, during the first few rehearsals, I struggled to memorize my lines and express the right emotions. I felt embarrassed because I wasn't prepared. That experience taught me a valuable lesson: knowing someone gave me a chance, but I had to build my own skills to actually earn my place on that stage. I spent weeks practicing my pronunciation and acting until I truly mastered the role.

In conclusion, who you know might give you a head start, like a key that unlocks a door. Yet, what you know is the foundation that keeps you standing strong inside. By focusing on improving ourselves and gaining real knowledge, we don't have to wait for someone else to help us—we can create our own opportunities.

Thank you for listening.
